To avoid plagiarism, you must always include proper referencing and citations for all the material you used in completing your assessments (coursework, assignments, projects, take-home tests/exams and open book tests/exams) You need to state clearly exactly what words or ideas have come from which source if they are not your original ideas.

Such material can be published or even unpublished sources. It can be a textbook, magazine, newspaper, online or other electronic media, lecture slides, notes, class hand-outs, other students' work, work from friends, relatives and family. This includes using your own work from another class, college or even from the same class, which you may be repeating. (Resubmitting the same work upon request from lecturer is not counted here)

Besides words, it can also be pictures, graphics, computer code, math or scientific working, etc. If you are unsure, always check back with your lecturers.

It is also considered plagiarism if you use software or other online resources to help you deliberately avoid plagiarism and also translating a source from another language and not citing the source properly.

Other forms of academic dishonesty include:

- 2) Collusion: helping your friend with the answers intentionally or unintentionally.

Common examples are when you share the softcopy of your work, a classmate copies your work from your laptop/flashdrive without your knowledge, letting others take a photo/screenshot of your work to help them.

If they submit the whole or even part of your work, both you and your friend will be considered to be guilty of collusion.

NEVER give your friends a copy (softcopy or hardcopy) of your work, tests, etc. until AFTER the submissions are closed. Ideally you should only let them see if when the lecturer has marked and returned it to you.

- 3) Contract Cheating: getting someone else to do the whole or a part of your assessments (coursework, assignments, projects, take-home tests/exams and open book tests/exams).

This also involves going to online sites to buy an assignment, paying someone to do it for you, or even getting a friend or relative to help with the assessment for you.

- 4) Falsification: Making up or changing data, information, results, claiming to have completed experiments, interviews which you haven't done and using this in your assessments. This also includes making up fake citations and references.

IICS library has resources to assist you in doing proper referencing. You can always see your lecturer or consult the Teaching & Learning dept for help.
